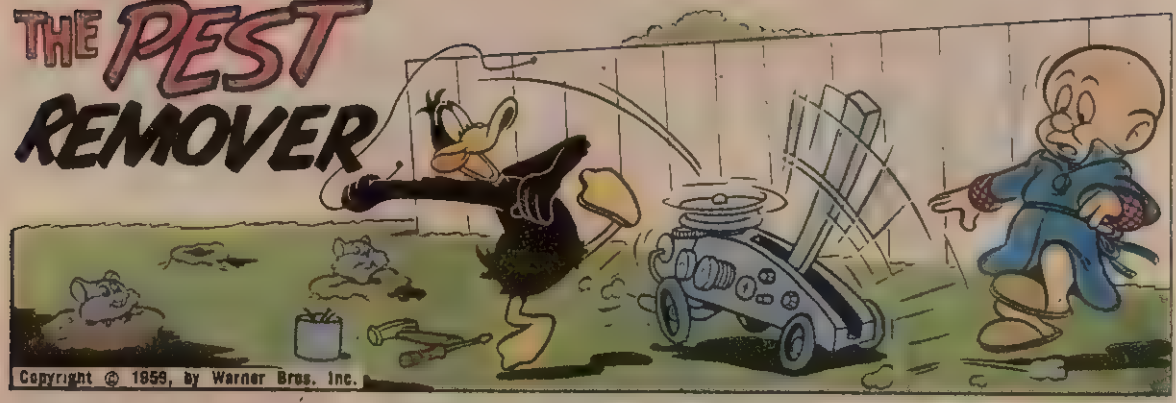
The End

THE PEST REMOVER



"Dwat it!" Elmer Fudd fumed one morning as he got out of bed. "I just wemembered, I'll have to spend most of the day working in the garden getting wid of those wodents who have been wuining my yard lately. I hope that pest, Daffy Duck, doesn't come awound and bother me the way he usually does."

Elmer yawned as he raised the window shade and blinked with surprise at what he saw from his window. Daffy Duck was boldly working on some mysterious machine which he had set up right there in Elmer's own back yard.

"Say! Just what do you think you're doing here?" Elmer demanded after he had thrown on a robe and stormed into the yard.

"Stand back, Stanley; no time for gab!" was Daffy's snappy answer as he busied himself checking dials and meters on his machine. "It's almost time for the countdown."

"Countdown?" Elmer exclaimed. "Don't tell me this contwaption is a wocket?"

"All right, have it your way," Daffy said mildly. "I won't tell you it's a rocket."

"But . . . but . . ." Elmer sputtered. "This is widiculous. Why are you doing this in my back yard? Why don't you use your own?"

"Now, now. Simmer down, Simon!" Daffy said airily. "To tell you the truth, this is really a little machine I invented just for you. I guarantee that it will be responsible for getting rid of all the pests you've been battling. There'll be a slight fee, of course," he added, smiling.

"I'll pay anything!" Elmer shouted eagerly. "How does it work?"

"This rocket gidgit," Daffy explained, "powers the razzle-dazzle, which kicks in the autogyro hoop-de-doo which makes this heavy club beat on the ground."

"That'll never do the job," Elmer said somewhat doubtfully.

"Sure it will," Daffy assured him. "When the pests hear the club beating on the ground, they'll be so scared, they'll all skedaddle. Stand back and I'll let her rip."

Elmer moved timidly to one side while Daffy made some final adjustments on the machine and started the motor. The machine coughed to life with a big puff of white smoke and was soon running all over the yard, its club hammering on the ground.

True to Daffy's words, when the rodents heard the noise, they scooted out of their holes and scampered away.

"Say, that's gweat!" Elmer crowed. But, a moment later, his joy turned to anger as he noticed something else. "L-look what that fool machine of yours has done," he stormed. "It has caved in all the wodents' tunnnels, and now my beautiful yard is wuined."

"What do you know . . . a sunken garden," Daffy said lamely, flinching under Elmer's glare. "There's no extra charge for that."

"Sunken garden? I'll give you a sunken head for wuining my yard!" Elmer roared "That's the only payment you'll get from me!"

"Well, uh, no, thanks," Daffy said, backing away. "Something tells me it's time for all good ducks to be heading south, or anyplace away from here. See you in a month or so, when you've cooled off. Good-by."

"Oh, well," Elmer shrugged when Daffy had left. "The machine got rid of the pests, the way Daffy said it would. At least I can thank my lucky stars for that.

"As a matter of fact," Elmer added with a sudden gleam in his eyes, "the machine worked perfectly. It got wid of Daffy, too, and he's always been the biggest pest of all!"
